

of the principal debtor, no right could be taken for his use in prejudice of the pursuer, who represented the cautioner; and therefore, the adjudication of his estate being purchased, as said is, ought to be declared null; whereupon they craved that the Lords might examine witnesses ex officio.

It was ANSWERED for the defender, That the right made by Crawfordland, both of the comprising and adjudication, being now in his person for an onerous cause, could not be taken away but scripto or his own oath; so that it was needless to examine witnesses ex officio. And as to any alleged prevarication of Mr Alexander Spoteswood, it could not prejudge him; unless it were proven, scripto vel juramento, that it was to the behoof of the said Mr Alexander, and that his name was only borrowed.

The Lords, before answer, did ordain the said whole defenders' oaths to be taken, ex officio, and any other to be condescended on by the pursuers, who had a hand in the said transaction; and that in respect of the importance of the cause, and that there was a near relation between Sir Laurence, Alexander Spoteswood, and the Laird of Wedderburn.

Page 117.

1670. June 23. The FEUARS of DUNNIKEIR against JOHN WATSON their Superior.

THE Superior having obtained decret of declarator against his vassals,—finding, after visitation of the ground, and report made, that he having given feus to 180 persons, with the privilege of quarry, clay, and divots of the Moor of Dunning, belonging to him in property, notwithstanding of any servitude foresaid, he might rive out and labour three acres thereof for his own use; yet with this quality, that, if the whole rest of the moor should not prove sufficient for the feuars' building and upholding of their houses, they might have recourse to the same three acres. The feuars, upon this decret of declarator, did intent a new declarator, at their own instance, against their superior, and some other new feuars, to whom he had granted the same privilege and servitude, concluding against them, that he had no power, in prejudice of the foresaid decret, to grant any servitudes, which would exhaust the moor, and make their right ineffectual.

It was ALLEGED for the superior, That he having dominium, and being proprietor of the whole moor, and the vassals' having only servitudes, any such right they had, did not take away from him a full liberty to make use of his own property at his pleasure; seeing, in law, dominus potest uti re sua ut libet; and, in all servitudes, as that of communis pastura, and others, there is a reservation in law to the superior, to make use of the ground and property for himself.

The Lords found the defence relevant, and ordained a new visitation: which was most hard, and contrary to their first decret; finding that the superior having granted servitudes to so many vassals, as the ground could not serve them to take in any new vassals; that he had no power thereafter to take from them the benefit thereof; which was just and consonant to law, they having jus quæsitum, both by the superior's own deed and by a decret of the Lords.

Page 118.